

The Loritos: Three Parrots Who Teach the World

In a bright, breezy village filled with mango trees and music, three very special birds lived in a tall treehouse near the town square. They were known as The Loritos—the smartest, most colorful parrots anyone had ever seen!

First there was Lorenzo a beautiful blue and yellow parrot. “¡Hola, amigos!” he chirped every morning.

“¡Vamos a aprender!” Let’s learn!

Lorenzo would fly from house to house, teaching children how to count in Spanish:

“Uno, dos, tres!”

And colors, too:

“Rojo is red, azul is blue, and amarillo is yellow—like me!”

Then there was Peter, a bright red and blue parrot with a loud laugh and a big heart. Peter's mission was to teach English to everyone in town.

“Good morning!” he'd call cheerfully.

“Let's practice our words!”

He sang silly songs and played word games. The children learned fast:

“Cat, dog, sun, tree!”

Finally, there was Coco, a fluffy white cockatiel with a gentle voice and a love for all things elegant. Coco taught French to anyone who wanted to learn.

“Bonjour, mes amis,” she cooed sweetly.
“Comment ça va?” How are you?

Coco taught greetings, colors, and even French songs.

“Bleu, blanc, rouge!” she’d sing, pointing to the village’s rainbow flags.

Together, Lorenzo, Peter, and Coco were the best teachers the village had ever known. Children, parents—even the mayor—came to the treehouse every day to learn new words and play language games.

The three parrots would perch side by side and lead the crowd in a chant:
“¡Hola! Hello! Bonjour!”

Everyone laughed and clapped, speaking new words with confidence.
